From earliest times Gaelic Ireland and Scotland, united by the sea, formed part of the same cultural, linguistic, religious, economic and political ethos. The cultural and linguistic homogeneity, together with the political instability of this North Channel World, alarmed central government. For the monarchs and their ministers—whether in Dublin, Edinburgh or London—regarded the economic, political and cultural distinctiveness of its inhabitants as ‘uncivilised’ and potentially ...

Spenser thought that Grey's efforts at hard-line reform in Ireland were frustrated by backbiting enemies at court and by the English government's vacillating and conciliatory policies towards the Irish. The Queen, from Spenser's point of view, was prone to compromise, change policy and be too merciful towards her enemies.
